(Matt. 5:14)

This Week

Our plans for the past week were put in perspective by reminders of what we control and what we don't. We hope this week goes better for our friends who have been dealing with sickness. We also hope that everyone made it through the winter weather in good shape. I've noticed that it sure looks pretty from the inside out, and that it starts feeling heavy real quickly in a shovel, and that I sure appreciate those who work around the clock to clear our roads (in other words, thanks Colton!). We're having our lot worked on and it'll be ready by Sunday.

We're starting a new series in our Sunday auditorium class this week. I can illustrate its importance with this question: Do you ever wonder, "If God is in control and at work in the world, why are there so many ways in which it looks like he isn't?" If so, you're not the first, and you're not alone. So, we're going to examine the little book of Habakkuk for these next few weeks. It's like a much briefer Job and a longer Psalm 73. It's worth thinking over just for the prophet's closing statements! But it's also very relevant, and quite challenging. Be sure to join us for the class if you're not already in another one.

And this week (hopefully!) we'll get started with our line of thought with regard to our selection of additional deacons. Wednesday evening we'll begin a series of three classes on this theme. It will be a combined class for all of us from youth up. This is an important aspect of our life together. I've noticed that in the instances I can find in the scriptures where responsible servants were given to the church, it was a relief to the church, not further pressure upon it. It was followed by joy, fruitfulness, and peace. I expect it to be that way for us too.

Valuable aspects of our fellowship continued on last week, and we anticipate that they will this week as well. For example, some called several others to check on them. Some helped families who were coping with illness. Some reached across generations in a Ties That Bind friendship. Some got some quiet time and used it to catch up with our daily Bible readings. Some worked on Bible class materials. Some prayed for someone who is bearing a burden. For all these things and many others, we're grateful.
