Our Mothers

We extend Mother's Day best wishes to all moms! Kay and I have been talking about our mothers. You don't quit remembering them, and they don't stop having an influence on you. Ours were as different from one another as we are, but we think they were also alike in some important ways.

Both our mothers were capable persons. They were able to do all kinds of practical things, and did. They both knew what it was to work and to bear responsibility. They made do with what they had. Each of them took delight in particular things in the natural world around them. And both of them were quite talented, each in her own way.

We've also thought about the hard things both our mothers endured. The burdens didn't come in the same form for them, but they both dealt with some very difficult things. Yet we don't remember either of them spending much time dwelling on their problems or complaining over their circumstances. It was just how life is, and they were strong enough to deal with it and stay mostly positive.

And though their ways of going about it were different, our mothers were both people persons, too. They enjoyed people and people seemed to like them. A sense of community was important to both of them, and each of them took joy in helping someone else. Their personalities weren't the same, but a smile came naturally to both of them, and each was understanding, respectful and patient with others.

That's just a few of the things we remember about our mothers. What stands out to you about yours? If you're still with her, what do you notice? Count your blessings, and tell her so, or tell the Lord so.
